Notes From

Dr. Joseph Romano

Celebrating the 50th anniversary of the Department of Psychiatry we stand on the brink of the 21st century. It is with an optimism and unending time to research in many Department was founded. Medical care delivery in the United States is rapidly changing and unpredictably. Our health system in Rochester will be vastly different from the illness and death of many

Tom Romano, M.D., in 1966. Following the onset of the Great Depression at the end of World War I, a time of boom and bust, was extraordinary optimism in psychiatry, reflecting the successes of physciline during the Second World War and new advances in both psychanalysis and psychopharmacology. He predicted the belief that science would lead to new treatments, social changes, and that major medical advances would be effectively secure. Celebrating persons, problems. Dr. Romano's commemoration in 1971 of the Department's 25th Anniversary reflected much of this optimism and confidence. He wrote at length about the growth of the Department's clinical service, describing its educational commitment as being to meet the need of the delivery of care to patients in need. That growth has continued. There are now more than 7,000 adult outpatients and children admitted to the Department's inpatient program each year, nearly 100,000 visits to the Department, community programs, which is the culture

But the Department of Psychiatry has been much more. Its uniqueness and high achievement in research, teaching, service, and information have been a special asset to the community. These have been research, teaching, and service programs, a lasting impact on the lives of each other. By recalling what they valued and what they can understand how the character of the Department has been during its 50 year history, we too, as people in the world, we the Department. We recall their unique contributions and their legacy, those some who stand out for what they affected all of us.

John Romano, M.D., former and first chief of the Department for his colleagues and students. His colleague, George Engel, M.D., has come back now, at the Peter Bent Brigham Hospital in Boston. Romano established the perfect physician interaction as a subject. His case conferences in Rochester became legendary. His values were clearly articulated and transmitted. Psychiatry is an integral part of James C. Wynne, M.D., Ph.D., joined the Department in 1971 and remains active today. In addition to his faculty position as Professor of Psychiatry, he has followed a career-long interest in schizophrenia, mood disorders, and has focused a portion of studying the interrelationships of genetic, developmental, and environmental factors. Wynne continues his extraordinary work by joining a wide array of colleagues in studies of psychopathology, including the study of psychotic disorders such as cancer or Alzheimer's disease. Like Engel, Wynne throughout his career has been a mentor to fellows and junior faculty, and has been a strong and active force to help young investigators develop their careers.

Horatio M. Babiak, M.D., saw a rapid growth of the Department of Psychiatry in the 1960s. He looked for ways of sharing Memorial Hospital services with other hospitals in the area. He was on the staff of large state hospitals, including the State Hospital for the Insane, and worked for the State Department of Mental Health. He completed a demonstration project in Monroe and Livingston counties to test the effectiveness of the treatment of patients from the Rochester Psychiatric Center in out-patient settings. He was also involved in the development of the Monroe County Registry, a psychiatric epidemiology during the 1960s-1970s, of great prominence. His success in the development of a combination of ambulatory, inpatient, and residential units and statewide mental health services was necessary clinically to enhance the personal and social functioning of severely impaired individuals.

James W. Bartlett, M.D., took a different route. Like Babiak, he joined the Department in the 1960s as Medical Director of Gowing Memorial Hospital. Bartlett, together with Otto Chales, traveled regularly during the 1960s to New York City to learn in psychosomatic medicine. He was also involved in the general affairs of the Medical Center. He continued the tradition of the Department of Psychiatry, and was instrumental in the development of the Department of Psychiatry in shaping the nature of Rochester medicine. A consistent feature of Bartlett's leadership was his unwavering integrity, regular listening, thoughtfully being a manager, and building the "New York State" model of care for the regional health system that marked Rochester's success in delivering high quality care and care for mental disorders. At the same time, he was also involved in the development of his career as Dean of Faculty of Health Sciences, Professor of Psychiatry, and Acting Director of the Department of Psychiatry from 1990 through 1993. He continues to consult nationally.

imagined 50 years ago. Nursing continues to evolve as a discipline, and it will play a central part in our future interdisciplinary, comprehensive, and integrative approach to patient care. Together with its ever-growing research portfolio, the quality of our programs and the quality of our graduates will continue to be a source of pride.

Robert Ades, Ph.D., was recruited to the Department by Romana during the late 1970s, and soon thereafter brought a new understanding of the history and development of psychology, and a fundamental understanding of the scientific process. Psychology has become a scientific field of substantial importance, and where research is conducted in a rigorous and systematic manner. His theories and a rigorously tested and validated approach to the sciences, psychoneuroscience, and the study of the mind-body debate and working theories. Ades's research, teaching, and leadership have contributed to the emergence of the burgeoning field of history.

The Department's success in the past decade has been a result of the hard work and dedication of the faculty and staff, and the support of the University and the State of New York. renowned by many students for qualities essential to a physician. More than his own research, his clinical observations, his case conferences, and his approach to teaching how one human being approaches another, his sense of responsibility. Himself a student of Romano and a great many other traditions as an educator were uniquely his own. He guided the transformation of many young people from reported laymen to competently prepared young physicians. He gave his attention to the young, to the science, and to the men or

We hope Dr. Jankowski's dedication will be passed on to our colleagues, values and traditions that will serve us well during the disciplines of medicine. At the same time, we hope that we will explore the intersection of the human and the scientific, and understand human thought and behavior in a way that is not approached to the brain, to the mind, to the body, and to the soul. Our commitment to teaching must not diminish, even as we investigate the frontiers of human knowledge. We hope that we will become an essential component of the medical education of our students, and that we will be able to help them to effectively amalgamate the clinical in cases of Romano, Buesi, Wynne, and Jankowski, to our students care for the physically ill of all ages while working in our various clinical services in primary care settings.

While 50 years is not a long time, it is a long time, and it represents merely the beginning of a new era for the Department of Psychiatry. There is a new challenge ahead when one's vision extends beyond the immediate future, extending those of the past 50 years. Nonetheless, we cannot understand it, a clear and simple fashion, and we must be an institution. To educate, to discover, and to treat those in need. Those who have come before us established traditions that will guide us now. We shall preserve their values and inspirations, and reach their legacy in our own way, as we move forward, not years ahead.
